NEW SURVEY EXPLODES MYTH OF GENDER SUPERIORITY IN ETHICS

A ground-breaking national ethics survey has dismantled the long-held societal assumption that women are inherently less prone to corruption than their male counterparts in public and private sectors. The findings suggest that the gender gap in ethical behavior is closing as more women take up influential roles in procurement and decision-making.

For decades, international development narratives and local discourse in Kenya have framed female leadership as a "silver bullet" for clean governance. However, the latest data released this April reveals that the propensity for bribery and embezzlement is dictated more by institutional culture and opportunity than by gender. The report indicates that when placed in similar positions of power and under similar economic pressures, the statistical difference in ethical "integrity scores" between men and women is less than 3 percent. Read more...

I BUILT RADICAL POSSIBILITY IN SCHOOLS — AND IT NEARLY BROKE ME

In my application to the Voices of Change Fellowship, I quoted musician Olu Dara's words to his son, the rapper Nas: "Quit school if you want to save your own life."

These words stunned me as an educator and student who understands the stakes confronting Black youth in education. Nas' conversation with his father did not feel unfamiliar, nor did it feel cavalier; it carried the audacity Black folks have had to nurture and maintain to survive. Read more...

HOW TRAUMA IMPACTS THE WELL-BEING OF BLACK WOMEN EDUCATORS

In the fall of 2023, EdSurge Research invited Black women educators to engage in a community-based, participatory research project and tell their own stories about their classroom experiences. All first-person accounts in this article belong to Sarah Wright and the participants of this study, with research support from Mi Aniefuna.

Navigating school spaces is a journey and students' needs are ever changing. While educators are leaving the field at unprecedented rates, many districts are scrambling to meet the needs of all their students. Read more...
